- D. was an immediate success in the UK.

5. What did the University of Buckingham compare?

- A. The abilities of over 30 people.
- B. The abilities of crosswords champions.
- C. The different types of brain needed to solve a cryptic clue.
- D. The connection between a talent for crosswords and the ability to reason logically.

Part 2. Reading

Task 2

Read a film review. Are the sentences True (T) or False (F)

Final: review

The camera focuses on a single shoe, a child's shoe, which is lying in the middle of an empty road. It casts a shadow on the tarmac. We can feel the intensity of the sun and its glare. Could the shoe have been flung from a car window or perhaps thrown by an angry toddler from the pavement? Who knows? We don't, not yet. The camera gets closer, and we can see that there are spots of red on the toe of the shoe – blood. Then we realise that what we thought was shadow on the road is something different. The colour changes from deep purple to dark red. We start to feel the tension. The camera widens its focus and we understand that the street is completely empty. There is no one on the pavement. Nothing moves, not even an old crisp bag or a leaf in the breeze. And then the silence hits us, and we shiver. This is how Sam Pickering's new disaster movie opens, and the shivers don't stop there; the film is full of very scary moments. In my opinion, this is a very special film, and I'm going to use a word that doesn't figure often in my vocabulary. I think it's a masterpiece.

The effect of this amazing film depends on shock and surprise, so I do not intend to say much more about the plot beyond the fact that it is very clever and very frightening. I'm not the sort of person who suffers from nightmares but after seeing Final, my sleep was uneasy for several nights. Pickering manages to touch us in all the most sensitive places and plays on our deepest fears. I defy anyone to leave the cinema with a smile on their faces. It's definitely not a feel-good film.

Final benefits from having a superb cast, led by Oscar® winner Brian Sneddon as the retired police captain and Faye Hunter as his troubled teenage daughter. There is a particularly tender scene between the two of them after the death of Brian's wife, Zena. However, for me, the biggest pull of the film is the use of advanced special effects. I cannot praise them enough. They are clever, magical, memorable and, most importantly, used in a way that carries the message of the film forward, not, as happens so often these days, an added extra. Through the camera's eyes, we see the power and majesty of nature from the depth of a tsunami to drought-besieged deserts, and yet this still cannot match the destructive power of man.

Do not wait to see this film on DVD. It demands to be seen on the big screen and if it doesn't claim a whole shelf of awards this coming year, I shall walk barefoot through the desert. No, on second thoughts, considering the subject matter of the film, maybe not! But seriously, this is one film NOT to be missed. It's an education, a visual feast and a true masterpiece.

6. The writer's initial understanding about the shoe was inaccurate. T/F
7. There are no people to be seen in the town when the film opens. T/F
8. The film has a happy ending. T/F
9. The special effects are used to help convey the message of the film. T/F
10. The star of the film has never won an award before. T/F
11. The film's message is that natural forces are more destructive than humans. T/F

Task 6

Complete the text by putting one word only into each gap.

Wireless electricity

All of us in the developed world use electricity every day in many different ways. As (56) _____ as we walk into a room we turn on lights without even thinking about it. We expect that when we flick a switch, the power (57) _____ be there any time of the night or day and if for any reason our power is cut (58) _____, it creates major problems. Today's homes are full (59) _____ electrical sockets and every day millions of us plug our mobile phones, laptops and PDAs in to charge (60) _____ batteries. This could become a thing of the past, though, if scientists succeed (61) _____ developing wireless electricity. Think of Wi-fi. Until quite recently, all computers connected to the internet had to be connected to a phone line. Today, many computers are capable of using a wireless connection, giving the computer user much (62) _____ freedom. Researchers want to do the same with electricity. In the future, instead of plugging your mobile into the wall, you'll be able to charge it simply (63) _____ leaving it near the power supply in your home. We can all (66) _____ forward to a day when the idea of connecting a TV to a hole in the wall will seem very old-fashioned. (67) _____ then, we'll all just have to keep plugging things in.

Part 4. Writing

Task 7

66. Write an essay giving arguments for and against the statement.

Some people think that implanting computer chips into human bodies or fitting humans with robotic limbs or bionic organs should be stopped because it goes against nature. Others believe that improving our bodies by becoming cyborgs is both highly desirable and inevitable.

Use this paragraph plan to organise your essay:

Paragraph 1: Introduction: Give a brief outline of the issue.

Paragraph 2: Present arguments in favour of the statement. Give examples.

Paragraph 3: Present arguments against the statement. Give examples.

Paragraph 4: Conclusion: summarise your main arguments and say what your opinion is.

Use 200-250 words.

Students' tips:

Paragraph 1: Introduce the topic clearly in an interesting way. Make a general statement about the main content without giving your opinion. Give a brief outline of the issue.

Paragraph 2: Examine the 'for' side of the argument with your justifications. Use linkers to connect your ideas in paragraphs.

Paragraph 3: Give the 'against' side of the argument in a fair way with examples to help the reader understand your arguments.

Paragraph 4: Restate the main arguments in your conclusion. State your opinion and give a balanced consideration of the topic.
